A: I have tried several Linux software and for personal and commercial use this one has been the best in terms of usability, security, technical support. Some features that distinguish it from other software are: It does not contain a virus or any malware and uses source code that is free of any known malware. (See FSF article about BlackOS.org) Free support forums with community feedback and technical support Multiple installation methods including the.deb package. Customizable user interface including a set of tools to configure it. Screen Lock: Prevent users from interacting with the screen (enable/disable/lock) or freeze the screen. Safer and more secure. (It does not store the key to unlock it) This link explains in detail the screen lock functionality. While the screen lock functionality does not need to be configured to a specific individual, the user interface allows to set to each user a separate user interface and configuration. A: I have used Lock-Desktop for many years. The program is packaged in.deb files and supports all Linux operating systems. I've used it on all versions of Linux from version 1 to version 7 of Ubuntu. It's been tested by me and many other people. It supports a wide variety of Linux desktop environments including LXDE, Enlightenment, Openbox, Xfce, KDE, Gnome, and Unity. It's very easy to use. The first time I used it, I didn't have to configure a thing. I configured Lock-Desktop to use the standard LXDE interface. I just gave it the name llock and the password. Then I started it. I locked the screen, and it locked it. Set a screen lock Manually lock the screen Start a screen lock applet Log out (or power off the computer) Power up the computer. Open the screen lock applet and unlock the screen. After I lock the screen, all I have
